Brève description

The multiple crises in Mali without ever being resolved have varied and complex causes, with feelings of inequality and injustice arising from them. However, most Malians who have lived through these periods of crisis believe that, even more than the conflicts themselves, it is their recurrence that seems, in the eyes of the populations, to constitute the main obstacle to peace and cohesion. This recurrence is largely explained by the limitations and failures in the management and resolution methods of imported conflicts but also by the inability of our Defense and Security Forces (FDS). This has fostered a crisis of confidence in themselves and their population.

These multiple politico-security crises have accentuated the deep crisis of confidence between the Defense and Security Forces (FDS) and the civilian populations. This situation of reciprocal mistrust, which is observed in several cases of societies recovering from conflicts, constitutes in itself a fundamental element of the crisis system which hinders the stabilization and consolidation of peace: "The relationship between civil society and the security sector is fundamental to human security. In many places, civilians view security forces with suspicion, perceiving them as predators rather than protectors. At the same time, many soldiers and police are also suspicious of civil society, questioning their intentions". This mistrust is characterized by certain factors explaining the dissatisfaction of the populations with the quality of the services provided by the FDS. These factors are grouped together at the level of the internal management of the SDFs themselves on the one hand, and the lack of dialogue and collaboration between the SDFs and the populations on the other hand.

Activities

- a. Train 90 young people, women and security force agents for four days on the fundamental texts relating to conflict prevention, mediation and management,
- b. Create 09 spaces for exchange and sharing, including one space in each of the nine communities of intervention on collaboration between the population and law enforcement and security forces,
- c. Train 30 young people (girls and boys) in video and photo editing techniques for the animation of the Facebook page of the Network,
- d. Organize 18 radio debates on the importance of good collaboration between populations and law enforcement and security forces to achieve lasting peace,

Partnership Association of Rotary participation

The National Network for Democratic and Patriotic Awakening (RENEDEP) was born out of an observation which today constitutes a real democratic challenge. It is about the participation in public life of the two majority groups (Women and Youth) who, unfortunately, are on the margins of the decisions that affect their lives. After more than two decades of democratic practice. RENEDEP is a private partner of the Rotary Club Bamako Ouest with which it has done a lot of humanitarian action, empowering women and building the capacity of young people and women leaders. This is why we are in partnership with this project in the center of Mali which is much weakened by conflicts.
